

Providing Comment at a Board Meeting

The Recreation and Conservation Funding Board and the Salmon Recovery Funding Board encourage public participation in their discussions and activities.

About the Boards' Processes

This document will help you understand the grant processes and decide how best to share your comments.

The boards use an open process to ensure their decisions are fair and based on objective criteria.

How Projects Get to the Board

Grant applicants compete for board funding. A grant proposal must meet the requirements for the grant program. These requirements are described in grant manuals, and include eligibility, match, planning requirements, and more. You can find the manuals online.

Advisory committees and review panels evaluate proposals against criteria set by the boards. These groups are made up of people who have experience in recreation, conservation, and salmon recovery, and they are listed on the boards' Web site.

Each grant program has unique evaluation criteria, but they generally include community support and involvement. The board encourages each grant applicant to demonstrate adequate public notification and review.

For Recreation and Conservation Funding Board projects, the advisory committees score projects and generate a ranked lists of projects. The ranked lists are presented to the board for funding consideration; every cycle, deserving applicants are turned away due to lack of funding.

For Salmon Recovery Funding Board projects, local watershed groups, called lead entities, use citizen and technical committees to evaluate grant proposals and generate ranked lists of projects. The ranked lists are reviewed by regional salmon recovery organizations and then by the board's technical panel, and ultimately submitted to the board for funding consideration.

How Can You Influence a Project?

If you are concerned about a project, a good first step is to contact the local government to learn about the approval process for that project. Many of the steps—such as environmental impact statements and permitting—require public hearings. You can participate in those hearings and write letters to decision makers to share your concerns.

The Boards' Roles in Land Use Issues

People sometimes attend board meetings to present concerns about how projects will affect their communities. Although the boards allows such testimony, some of the issues are outside the boards' authorities and must be resolved by local planning departments or elected officials.

Land use decisions, such as a project's location, environmental impact, zoning, or other effects on a community, are outside the boards' authorities. The boards' evaluation committees may score a project on how well it conforms to a community comprehensive plan, but the boards do not review the decision of the local government on whether a project meets its zoning or has thoroughly addressed environmental impacts.

Grant agreements require the grant recipient to secure all permits before beginning construction. The grant recipient can work with board staff to change the scope of a project based on what they learn during the permitting or public hearing phases. If a project cannot be completed for permitting or other reasons, the board moves the funding to other grant proposals.

Providing Comment at a Board Meeting

Tips on Making Effective Comments

Start by introducing yourself for the record. Indicate whether you are representing yourself or a group.

Address your comments to board members, not to the audience.

Speak into the microphone.

Explain why you are interested in the project or subject.

Make your remarks brief and clear; limit your comments to 3 minutes.

Avoid being too technical.

Do not repeat remarks made by others. If you know others will be offering similar comments, try to coordinate and avoid duplication.

Comment only on issues relevant to the discussion.

State opinions and preferences, ask questions, and propose alternative solutions to particular issues. Where possible, include data to support your opinion.

Be prepared for questions and comments from board members.

Use facts and objective evidence.

Avoid personal attacks.

For both boards, the evaluation sessions are open to the public. Correspondence from the public is sent to board members at the same time as the lists (about 2 weeks before the meeting).

Projects also come before the boards when a change, which requires board approval, occurs to the project. These changes may include conversion to a different use, a change in project scope, or a time extension.

Spoken Comments

At a meeting, board members may ask questions about projects, the evaluation process, and how projects relate to the criteria. Members of the public are welcome to comment.

If you wish to speak at the meeting, fill out a comment card (available at the meeting) and give it to the board liaison. When the board chair calls your name, please have a seat at the speaker's table. Speak clearly into the microphone, and begin with your name for the record. If you also provide written comments, please summarize those points or make additional comments when you speak. You do not need to read your comments to the board.
